Success with Chinese: A Communicative Approach

Most English speakers learn to converse in Chinese faster than they learn to read and write, and this course takes that into account. It has separate components for listening/speaking and reading/writing, so that learners' conversation skills are not slowed down by the pace of their character acquisition. The course teaches students the language they will need in everyday situations right from the start – the listening and speaking course covers situations such as ordering at a restaurant, making phone calls and dealing with hotel staff, while the reading and writing book covers restaurant menus, signs, forms, money and much more.

Urban Chinese:

Mandarin in 21st Century China 36.95

The author of this book, a young foreign student in China, devised his own learning technique centred around word association techniques based on his native English language and using Chinese logic. It is divided into five sections: Pinyin and Tones, Radicals, Category Usage Dictionary, Idioms and Slang.

Very Good: Spoken Chinese for Beginners

Similar in structure to other conversational courses, lessons are based on the opening dialogues. Paragraphs appear in simplified characters, pinyin and English. Short exercises analyse the language, and creative tasks make practical use of recently learnt material. A unique aspect of the course is the emphasis on the storyline about four colourful characters in a Chinese classroom. The course writers have defined the individuality of each character so well, that exercises often venture into role play and writing original dialogues based on the personalities and the situations they find themselves in. Certainly a fresh turn from the rote, repetitious drills of most other courses. A supplementary booklet contains the Korean and Japanese translations and vocabulary lists. An audio CD contains the dialogues and word lists.
